

THE EVENING STORY.

HIS BOOKKEEPER.

(Copyright, 1913, by W. Warner.)

Old Martin—folks called him old, although he was far from sixty—scowled over the long counter heaped with tomato cans, pickle jars, mosquito-netting-covered leaves of bread and stale cake. Jimmy, he conceded, was a good-enough bookkeeper, but for a woman going on thirty-nine she was too flighty. And it wasn't as if she looked young, either. For all her yellow hair—and he'd a strong suspicion that she "touched" it up—she had a series of wrinkles near each gray eye that absolutely denied youth. Of course, in the dimness of the rear of the store, with the iron netting of her booth as a screen and her hair combed fluffily and with a coat of powder, she looked tolerably fetching. Martin didn't actually blame that baking powder drummer for stopping to talk five nights last week, but the blamed fool thought she was a girl—drummers were that stupid.

But he did blame Jimmy. He wasn't going to have his store brought into disrepute by her flightiness. First thing he knew, folks would be saying that he, a deacon in the Baptist church, was encouraging her, first thing he knew—

"Say, Mr. Martin," inquired Jimmy, tripping up—that trip was another thing that annoyed her employer. Why in Sam Hill didn't she buy flat-heeled shoes like a woman of her age ought to wear, "stead of them flimsy military stiffs? Do you care if I take a day off tomorrow? This is a picnic."

"No," said Mr. Martin, sourly. "I don't care. How could he say that? He didn't have to work five last week, he was in the new summer stock? All the same, it was mighty mean of her taking advantage of me. I was a shame to a day off when she knew that he wanted to clean out the basement and so would like to have her attend to the customers. Henry, the one clerk, couldn't handle an excess."

And, anyway, what did she hanker for? At thirty-nine a woman ought to be past such flightiness. Listen to her telling the drummer—fat old man, who ought to be writing a letter to his wife instead of hanging over her, talking nonsense—"Sure, I'll be there, Mr. Brennan. And I'll show you a real chocolate cake tastes like! I'll wager you haven't eaten—Oh, is that so? It's kind of young to tell me that."

"Say, Miss Jimmy," called her employer, testily. "You wrap up some beans for Mrs. Cooper. She's coming."

Jimmy came forward cheerfully. "Two pounds, Mrs. Cooper? My, what a pretty hat you've got! Would you get me if I copied it? Not exactly, of course."

"La, no!" laughed Mrs. Cooper. "No, I don't want any chili sauce. Oh, well, if you say it's all good."

Mr. Martin frowned. That was the worst of it. Jimmy was so all-fired cheerful and she had such a knack of increasing trade that you couldn't walk up to her and say, boldly: "Jimmy, you're too old to be so foolish." You just couldn't do it, that was all there was to it. Some one ought to tell her, though. Some one ought to say, kindly and friendly, of course, "Jimmy, Pierce, you are thirty-nine years old, and it's perfectly disgraceful for you to wear low-cut shirt waists and three bracelets—even if your arms are round—and curl your hair like a young girl. And if you wish that he had enough gumption to say it. And, as a friend, he really ought to refuse to let her off to go to the picnic. A picnic argued all the flightiness in Jimmy's disposition. He had seen cut short their badinage. When the store was empty again and Brennan, not urged to stay, had breezed to the store across the street, Martin cleared his throat and firmly prepared to do his duty. "Be you much set on going to that picnic?" he asked. "I'm like to clean up some odd jobs, and I hate to neglect the store."

"Oh, there won't be any trade," said Jimmy. "Everybody in town is going. Why don't you come along?"

Mr. Martin's face grew red. "I don't go to picnics—except church affairs. Then, of course, it's my duty. I ain't giddy—I know how old I am. I'm like to clean up some odd jobs, and I hate to neglect the store."

"Oh, well," laughed Jimmy. "I'm not ever going to get old. Mr. Brennan says—"

"A lot of rubbish," snapped Mr. Martin. "Did he ever tell you about his wife that's so sick? He looked away as he hung the shot. It was a shame to hurt her, but it was for her own good."

"Yes," said Jimmy, nonchalantly. "Martin said her in amazement. And she knew all about it. And she was willing to go to a picnic with a married man. Oh, well, he couldn't afford to bring his store into disrepute."

"He seems awful fond of his wife," Jimmy said. "He's coaxed her to go to the picnic. She's staying at a hotel over near the lake. He said maybe a lively person like me could talk her out of her blue spells. He said the doctor said there wasn't much the matter with her but brooding over their little boy's death. He asked me to bring a chocolate cake along—she used to be a dandy cake baker, but now she won't do anything but brood. I'm anxious to see her. And I just told him plain maybe he was to blame. I'll wager he's just being a little bit of a dandy. He takes a trimming nicely. My, I said a terrible lot to him. You know, with a deprecating laugh, 'a silly person can say things without offending folks.'—meditating. 'I'm sort of ashamed of being so gay—I'm not very young. But sometimes I think it better to be too gay than too melancholy.'"

A very strong flash of light came over Mr. Martin's soul. "Why, darn it all!" and that was strong language for Deacon Martin—"I believe I was jealous!" Not that he said it, but he said it loud. He said it in the depths of his heart. And then he added to himself, "I ain't so old, either. I wonder if Jimmy's wife ain't pretty near fifty. I guess—"

Out loud he said, "I believe I'll close the store and take in that picnic myself."

Mr. Martin's face grew red. "I don't go to picnics—except church affairs. Then, of course, it's my duty. I ain't giddy—I know how old I am. I'm like to clean up some odd jobs, and I hate to neglect the store."
